Japanese Walking

Japan is often reported as having the longest life expectancy¹. Japanese people live to be an average of above 84 years old. Many people say this is because of the country's healthy diet. Another reason could be how people walk. Japanese people walk a lot. This has started a new fitness trend on TikTok, called "Japanese Walking". It involves walking quickly for three minutes and then slowing down for three minutes. Walkers repeat this pattern five times. Health experts say Japanese walking is good for posture², blood circulation³, lowering blood pressure, and reducing stress. It has also been linked to a lower risk of dementia⁴. Doctors also say it can help people live longer.

Japanese people might not know about the term "Japanese Walking." To them, it is just walking. Researchers at Shinshu University in Matsumoto, Japan came up with the name in 2007. They conducted a study on high- and low-intensity walking. The recent worldwide popularity of the walking method is due to videos made by Eugene Teo, an Australian fitness coach and social media content creator. He wanted people to follow a simple exercise routine that had an easy-to-remember name. His videos have had 10 million views on TikTok and 17 million views on YouTube. He said he wanted "to make fitness advice and scientific jargon⁵ a lot more accessible."

Tattoos¹

Rugby players with tattoos will cover them up during next year's World Cup in Japan. The sport's governing body² World Rugby wants to avoid offending people in Japan, where tattoos are a taboo³ in public. Tattoos are usually associated with yakuza crime gangs⁴ in Japan. Many swimming pools, gyms, bath houses and onsen in Japan ban people with tattoos from entering. However, in 2016, Japan's tourism agency asked onsen and gyms to relax their rules because tourists had tattoos for different reasons. The agency suggested giving tourists stickers to cover the tattoos.

The Rugby World Cup director Alan Gilpin said the teams understood the cultural sensitivity⁵ about tattoos. He said : "When we raised it with the teams...we were probably expecting a frustrated reaction⁶ from them, but there hasn't been." He said the players want to respect Japanese culture. Players will wear a vest used for water sports as a form of "self-policing⁷." The All Blacks team from New Zealand said its players will comply⁸ with the request. It said : "We endeavor⁹ to be respectful of the local customs and culture, and this will be no different when we visit Japan."
